David Cantine and Robert Dmytruk

Vision carries color. Although the other senses have used color metaphorically to describe auditory, tactile or sensations of smell, it is only through vision that we can experience color. We cannot discern red through our touch nor hear it although it may come to mind when we touch something hot or hear a siren. Color is an intrinsic definer that allows us to conceptually realize subtle shades of variation in the physical world, in order to distinguish objects one from the other. An orange may disappear in an orange-colored bowl for instance, or a green snake in green grass. Nature uses color to differentiate, attract, signal, and in nature the ability to recognize the significance of color can be a matter of life or death – once again that snake...

Visual artists use color as one of their tools, one that is very specific to the discipline. The patchwork of contemporary existence must be processed, organized, labeled and put into context in order to function within the myriad and splintered needs that modernity has bequeathed. This is a strictly utilitarian statement: what we must bring to the table in order to be able to eat. There is another level to the overwhelming choice of paths and tangential off-shoots of modernity and it has been termed the 'highroad'. The intersecting levels of the humanities (culture, history, religion, philosophy) tend to gel the confusion into systems of thought and aesthetics. This is a statement that leans towards the spiritual and back to the table – it is the nourishment that keeps us going.

David Cantine has worked with four circles and thousands of colors within a rectangular format, often under plexiglass, for over forty years within a formalist philosophy that uses many permutations of focusing within a model. He states, “Color in Painting has a tendency to advance or recede from other colors in the picture. My work explores this tendency”.

Color theory, which first appeared in the renaissance, has been a base-in-trade during art education but despite the urge to pin color down to a pattern, because of the many color theories formed on patterning that work in contest, the area has remained still open for exploration in a way that appeals as much to the mind as to the senses. It is this methodical, open-ended variance that sparks David Cantine's work. Inspired by the historical painter Morandi who spent a lifetime painting repeated versions of the same still life, Cantine's research has been intensive (he began with four apples with shadows) and yielded affirmative results. The modest compositions satisfy the quest to visually comprehend and yet leave room for the imagination. Seeing one color beside another with a third behind suggests alternatives and our human desire to experience growth is simultaneously nurtured and inspired.

The basis of Cantine's work is drawing from life in pencil and pen, that quiet practice of seeing and recording that reflects a communication between objects in the physical world through markings made by the hand under the influence of decisions made by the brain. The outside is brought inside and then put outside again for reconsideration. Something intuitive has transpired.

"All of the drawing of the shapes is in support of color/space: the square, central format; the lack of overlap; the very limited linear perspective; the solid, unbroken color; the symmetrical composition; and so forth," Cantine says.

The addition of the cross or plus sign is new and represents another leap forward in a necessarily rigorous discipline. Again, Cantine: "Lately I have been going back and painting a decorative element, a plus mark, to some of my earlier pictures thus risking the structure described. But I have found - and this is the focus of the current Headbones show - that the PLUS has actually made the picture seem more real, more at home in the world." Like punctuation to a phrase or accessory to design, the elements change in relationship to each other and to the picture with the appearance of the intersecting lines upon the circle.

Robert Dmytruk's take on color – his PLUS – is revealed in his openness to change. Whereas exactitude rules Cantine's use of color, Dmytruk appears to relinquish control to whim and fancy. There is finesse, informed through years of art making that comes into play and, as with Cantine, his choice of a color combination allows a step with an implied past and future rather than a locked-in state of being. Dmytruk uses color as nature does. He explores a number of patterns, sets up relationships between ground and object, size and composition, edges and insides so that although there is a mechanical method – as in a repetition of shapes or the repeated use of cut-outs, templates and screens, the artist-at-play with the wit of circumstance is evident.

Without ignoring the flotsam (debris by chance) and jetsam (deliberate debris) that surrounds us, Dmytruk has dealt a better hand as if cleaning up a potential for chaos. He has employed the trait that so often calms stress – play. It would be hard to attribute angst to these works.

Patterns grant regular or intelligible forms that coincide with the desire for stability. They mark space and lend reference. Dmytruk's patterning gives the illusion of relief as he visually plays with the vertical surface. He suggests the figurative with a lyrical finesse. His works are rhythmic as if he is painting music.

Uplifting work - art that is light - makes room for the best in man to be acknowledged. Dmytruk's work is a welcome respite from confusion without ignoring the diversity of life.

David Cantine taught Drawing at the University of Alberta for over thirty years and has been featured multiple times in the Alberta Biennial of Contemporary Art at the Art Gallery of Alberta. His work has been exhibited in over 20 solo exhibitions and over 30 group shows, at the Art Gallery of Alberta, at the University of Alberta's FAB Gallery, and at the Museum of Contemporary Canadian Art among others.

Robert Dmytruk also taught in Edmonton. He first studied under David Cantine and their friendship and professional liaison continues to this day. Gathered at the same table once again for COLOR +, Dmytruk is generous and gives a lot from a full banquet array. Cantine has culled and with precision offers a wealth of options from a spare plate. The meat of the matter, the common staple for each, has been color. The plus sign is personal; for Cantine it is a basic recipe, for Dmytruk a cacciatore. But the main ingredient remains the same – COLOR.
